The effects of Parkinson's disease can be physically and emotionally hard on those who suffer from the disease and those who care for them.

If diagnosed early, rehabilitative treatment and therapy can reduce the side effects, helping the patient lead an active lifestyle. The goal of our hospital's Parkinson's rehabilitation program is to give patients a chance to achieve maximum independence. The program teaches disease management by improving physical capabilities, including: Individual assessment of patient's strengths and limitations Working with patients on endurance training, adaptive living skills, mobility training and communication/cognitive skills Providing patient, family and caregiver education Strengthening the patient's self-image Maintaining a continuum of care that focuses on independence and safety -

Treatment for Parkinson's patients may include:

- Medical management by a rehabilitation physician
- Physical therapy to improve movement, walking and balance
- Occupational therapy to develop skills and strategies
